Indirect Statements continued:

Tense of the infinitive in indirect statements:

All three tenses of the infinitive can be used in an indirect statement (present, perfect or future).

The correct tense of the infinitive can be determined by the relationship of the indirect statement – time wise – to the verb of saying, thinking, believing, etc. of the main sentence that has initiated the indirect statement. The relationship is as follows:

present infinitive = same time as the main verb perfect infinitive = time before the main verb future infinitive = time after the main verb

main verb
present

infinitive

dīcit puellam Rōman venīre dīcit puellam Rōman vēnisse dīcit puellam Rōman ventūram (esse)

he says that the girl is coming to Rome he says that the girl came to Rome he says that the girl will come to Rome

main verb
perfect

infinitive

dīxit puellam Rōman venīre dīxit puellam Rōman vēnisse dīxit puellam Rōman ventūram (esse)

he said that the girl came to Rome he said that the girl had come to Rome
he said that the girl would come to Rome

Gerunds:

The gerund is formed and spelled exactly like the gerundive. (present stem + nd + ending)

But, the gerund is always active, unlike the gerundive which is always passive.

The gerund is also limited in its forms because it is:

oblique (no nominative form) neuter (no masculine or feminine forms) singular (no plural forms)

Therefore the gerund can only have 3 endings: -ī, -o, -um

Gerunds can be used in most ways that nouns can be used (means, manner possession etc, but not as subjects because they are oblique) and also with ad, causā and gratiā to express purpose.

tibi nūlla spēs fugiendī est Belimicus ad dīcendum surrēxit.

There is no hope for you of fleeing.
Belimicus rose to speak.

Although gerunds, being verbal in nature, can take objects, they seldom do in real Latin. Romans much preferred to use gerundive constructions when there was an object.

tibi nūlla spēs fugiendī urbem est There is no hope for you of fleeing the city

In this sentence “fugiendī” is a gerund with “urbem” as its object. Although this is possible, Romans would not prefer this construction. They would more likely use a gerundive construction, such as:

tibi nūlla spēs urbis fugiendī est There is no hope for you of the city being fled.

In this sentence “urbis” is modified by “fugiendī”, and not the object of it. “fugiendī” is a gerundive is and passive.

Inceptives:

Incipient verbs, (also called inchoative verbs) can be formed from other verbs, nouns or adjectives. They characteristically always have a base ending in -sc . They express an action which is the beginning of a continuing process.

convalēscere - starting to get well pallēscere - beginning to grow pale

Sed quis custodiet ipsos custodies.
